"Architecture that is about architecture bores me," says A. Anthony Anella, an architect who has chosen to focus his attention on the relationship between the built and the natural landscapes of the American West through design, research, and writings. Load-bearing adobe walls, mud plaster interiors, and wood beams make Anella's Plank House, a vacation house in the Rio Grande Valley of southern New Mexico, an eloquent synthesis of landscape and indigenous architectural tradition. The architect, who cites Vincent Scully and J.B. Jackson among his influences, views architecture as a part of "the larger cultural continuum."
